Artificial intelligence (AI) is transforming sectors from healthcare to education, with its impact on journalism being particularly profound. As the media landscape evolves, AI presents both powerful tools and significant threats to press freedom, integrity, and public trust.

Forbes also published an interesting piece on "Will AI Replace Writers? Here's Why It's Not Happening Anytime Soon". "Yes, robots can do a lot of amazing things, but one thing they will never be able to do is write like a person. AI writing tends to be mechanical and formulaic—which is fine for technical writing, but problematic when you need to convey warmth and authenticity in order to engage readers and build trust."

World Spotlight

Country: Mexico

Key Links: Study Abroad Guide

Key Information:

- Applying to study in Mexico works differently from systems with a single national portal: you generally apply directly to each university.
- Public universities like UNAM and IPN run their own competitive entrance exams (the famous UNAM admission exam admits a small fraction of applicants), while private universities like Tec de Monterrey and Ibero have rolling or term-based admissions with their own tests and interviews.
- Most undergraduate programs are taught in Spanish, so you will often need a DELE or equivalent certificate, though English-taught options are growing at Tec and in graduate programs.
- Most Mexican universities run two main intakes: the larger one starting in August (otoño/fall) and a second in January (primavera/spring).
- Apply at least six to nine months ahead of your intended start, because public-university exams have fixed registration windows.
